THE ARCHITECT'S STUDENT AND WORK LIFE IN THE FUTURE

Friday, November 24, from 12.00 – 16.30, Didakteket

FAOD, the Danish Association of Architects, and Aarhus School of Architecture invite everyone in the architecture industry to a joint discussion on what the values and culture of the younger generation mean for the development of our educational institutions and workplaces – and what it means for the development of the architectural profession.

Studies show that ethics and values play a crucial role for the younger generation – just like stress and well-being are growing challenges. Many talk about a paradigm shift among students and the younger generation of architects in their approach to academic and professional life.

With this seminar, we aim to initiate a debate on sustainable academic and professional life and gain insights into how this paradigm shift challenges the organisation of young people's education and professional lives across all stakeholders in the architecture industry.

We hope to see architectural firms, municipalities, the school's staff and students, other educational institutions, labour unions, and others for a collective discussion across stakeholders.

Participation is free, but registration is required before November 20. You can register via the QR code.

The seminar is in Danish, but there will be English interpretation available.
